From the Secretary's Desk

It is well recognized that development to be meaningful and Sustainable necessarily calls for effective decentralization and people's active participation through voluntary action. With the increased financial assistance and technical support from the Government, the voluntary movement has grown immensely and voluntarism has since taken many strides. Voluntary sector is now playing a very significant role, both as catalyst and a prime mover, in rural development in India.

With the indomitable efforts for rural development & welfare, experience gained there from during the last two decades or no. of its historical growth and also with NIRMA's whole hearted dedication to the causes for an all-round development for the deprived people in rural areas of Manipur has undoubtedly been prompted to express that participation and empowerment, are not necessarily the two sides of the same coin. However, there are strong indications that if obstacles to participation like legal systems, bureaucratic constraints, social norms etc. are removed or reduced efficiently, most participatory development projects would succeed in empowering the people, and the two terms would be found converging.
